

Amy Schofield

MSCCN Applicant Specialist and Volunteer Coordinator

Amy Schofield grew up in a small New England town and never dreamed of being part of the military family. However, while attending college in Washington, DC, she met her future husband while he was a midshipman at the United States Naval Academy. Since becoming a military spouse herself, Amy has become deeply passionate about issues affecting all military families, especially the hardships military spouses face each time they are relocated or their spouse is deployed.

Amy has a Bachelor of Arts degree from American University's School of Public Affairs with a specialization in Communication, Legal Institutions, Economics and Government. She also has a Graduate Certificate in Human Resources Management from Villanova University.

Her professional experience includes several years working in human resources, public affairs, and administrative capacities. She has developed recruitment and orientation programs, managed payroll systems and benefits plans, drafted company policies and procedures, tracked and promoted legislation for a trade association, and was instrumental in helping an organization attain national accreditation certification.

Amy initially joined the MSCCN team as a volunteer in August 2009 and two months later was hired to develop MSCCN's MilSpouse Volunteer Training and Employment Program. Amy currently oversees this program and also works with military-affiliated applicants to provide them with job-related resources.

Amy is married to a Navy pilot and recently relocated to southern Maryland.
